Cultivation of the Sweet Potato.

In recommending our plan for the cultivation of the Sweet Potato, we are not influenced by the accounts published in agricultural papers, but by practical knowledge, derived from many year's experience in the business—an experience that can be relied on by those who may wish to raise this esculent. Sweet Potatoes are as easily raised as the Irish potato, yield double the quantity to the acre, and always bring a better price.

Our plan is this : First plow the ground very shallow, not more than four inches deep ; this must be done as soon as the soil is in suitable condition to be plowed—the earlier the better.

Then leave it till the time of planting, (which is from the fifteenth of May to the fifteenth of June) ; then strike the furrows with a corn plow, the same as you do for corn ; these furrows should be three and one-half feet apart ; after which place the manure in the furrows, spreading it along to an even thickness ; the manure may be the same as that used for corn or potatoes ; a compost of horse manure with barnyard and hog manure I find the best.—Then take a two-horse plow, and cover the furrow from each side, throwing the soil directly over the manure as high as practicable. After which take a hoe and smooth off the ridge, and you are ready for the plants. The plants should be set 16 inches apart, either just before a shower or immediately after, an over-cast day being preferable. Nothing more need be done but to tend them as you would any other field crop, except when the vines begin to run, they must be kept from rooting in the rows, as this takes away the substance from the hill. Some prefer placing them in hills, but we find rows much easier in making and tending.

The above plan is adapted only to loamy soil ; those who have a sandy soil must not give the same treatment. We have found that it paid well to put sand in the hills where the ground was a little heavy.
